"In 2019, I attended a conference, and the keynote speaker shared this quote. The context focuses on an undocumented student whom the keynote speaker (an instructor) interacted with; the instructor had the class reflect on their experiences, and one student shared that they were an undocumented person living in the United States. What follows is this reflection of the quote - having the courage to find a better life - and how this individual wished they had the courage to have the dreams and hopes to live a better life, while they see others doing the same. The fear, reservation, and desire to emulate, but feeling lost and trapped or lost. I think we always feel this way when we see others living life and wonder what is holding us back. What hopes do we carry or not carry? How do we live better lives knowing the system is against us?"
